HORSE BECAME RIGID Strange Case of $250 Animal_Which Died from Lockjaw.

James Kent of Elmville has lost a horse from a malady not unknown among horses, but very uncommon-lockjaw. The horse was sick only two days. How the animal came to contract the disease is a mystery. Mr. Kent bought the horse about three months ago and it was worth from $250 to $300.

$250 to $300.

Charles M. Adams, one of the best known horsemen in this part of the state, saw the horse and gives an interesting description of its condition previous to death. From muscles along the back and leading down from the neck becoming rigid, the horse's tail also became stiff and stood out on almost a straight line with the backbone. neck becoming rigid, the horse's tail also became ettiff and stood out on almost a straight line with the backbone. The animal's ears also became rigid, as did the legs, so that when the horse was lying down the legs on the upper side were extended stiffly out from the body, much the same as would those of a dead horse. The mouth of the horse could be opened only about a quarter of an inch.

No cut or wound of any kind could be found on the horse. Mr. Adams explains, however, that horses suffer from lockjaw contracted from causes that result in blood poisoning and again from lockjaw that may be caused by a chill or cold due to exposure or change of climate, as with horses, for instance, that might be shipped into New England from other parts of the country. Cases of lockjaw among the animals are rare, though.
